a lonely roadside Cotto came upon his victim and with savage fury stabbed him no less than fourteen times. Frankcioso was left lying dead in the road.

Cotto returned to the Frankcioso home, and standing before the woman he had widowed, he had committed the deed.

After he was convicted of the murder all his he had committed the deed.

After he was convicted of the murder all his bravado deserted him, and he became the cowering wretch whose fear of death is in such strong contrast with the calmness of other men who have occupied condemned cells in Sing Sing.

His sleep is disturbed by frightful dreams, and he cries out in the hight that they are going to kill him. The brutal butchery of Frankcioso recurs as a vision, and he frequently awakes screaming with terror. He rises in the morning worn out by the mental torture of the night, and sits all day smoking list pipe and reading the Italian prayer-book which has been supplied him.

The fear of death has made him very devont. He eagerly welcomes Father Milo, the Italian assistant of Father Creedon, who is prepariting him for the end, but it is as much as the good priest can do to prevent his complete breakdown now.
